Research Interests

I study the dynamic states of humans and AI in open environments, starting from one question: when an AI system gets it right, what has it actually kept? As unmanned systems perceive under changing light and motion, multimodal large models follow ever longer videos, and LLM-based agents act as people over long interactions, getting the current step right is not enough; what a system carries forward from earlier steps must still hold. I ask what a system should keep, update, or leave open as new observations arrive. A correct answer at one moment cannot show this, so I tell a right answer from a kept state by changing the conditions, the time that passes, or the people involved. I design tasks and benchmarks that examine the state itself, with human performance and judgment as the reference where no single ground truth exists; I also build models that hold these states better, and test them in open-environment visual perception, long and streaming video understanding, and human–AI education.

Across Conditions	Whether a capability still holds when task and environment conditions change: user-defined task spaces, condition-level benchmarks with human baselines, capability profiles that predict behavior in new settings, and tracking for nighttime UAV vision
Over Time	Whether what a system carries forward still holds as time passes: target identity after disappearance, descriptions that hold only for a stretch of video, language cues that can go stale, and long and streaming video understanding with multimodal large models
Between Humans and AI	What counts as being right when people disagree, or when AI stands in for people or works with them: human judgments as reference distributions, human–machine comparison on the same tasks, whether LLM-based virtual students behave like learners, and AI in education

Each direction runs from evaluation to modeling to application: evaluate where a state holds and breaks, model systems that keep, update, or leave it open, and test them in real settings, from UAV vision and video understanding to education and research practice itself.
